Simply put, the camera RAW converter bundled with Photoshop CS6 is the fastest and most powerful converter available for the Fujifilm X-Series cameras. Unlike Silkypix, you don't need to create a.slp document. Just open the Adobe DNG Converter, create an adjustment layer, and use the easiest option, and yes, it'll even work with the X-T2. In many ways, Adobe gets closest to, and best, Photoshop, in terms of raw conversion, and the new features it brings for the X series, including global gamma curve, tone mapping, and even improvements to Fujifilm's color matrix, are welcome. A new and very welcome addition are the Effects panel and the new adjustment layer system. Should you spend your time and money on products like Photoshop or should you save up for another Radeon or a playable game? How to decide? Let me answer this question, as well as all the others presented on the site, through an unusual experiment. I'll present you with 25 random reviews ranking the 25 best and worst software products and explain why the average is taken, even if such an average is rather meaningless. I was surprised with my results. The average percentile for Adobe's products was 76%, which was.99 wins. That means that out of every 100 reviews, Adobe's products made at least 99 good reviews. The third best product overall was one of my favorites, Anno 2070, which came at 83.6% – better than the second best products in the book. Of course, not. In fact, I would give people like Magic Bullet Suite a 4%, while my top reviewer gave it 8 stars. No one can really tell me what is wrong with their software, and some of them seem to be vindictive too. Not only did Magic Bullet Suite not rank too high, why is it that I need to couple the software with an external hard drive and a USB external disc drive? Completely inadequate files are in use, especially for something as important as a photo editing program. What is ridiculous, is that some reviewers are debating if the various brushes are original. The same goes for the more advanced selection and healing tools. Not only did some reviewers spend a lot of time comparing between the brush previews located on the shelf, and said that they didn't see any differences, but some even chimed in asking other users not to waste their time. So basically, what makes the software seem even more incompetent, is that some of the reviewers just don't seem to care and play around with many settings on their own. Researchers may be more impressed with such calls. And often the reviews contain so little useful information that I wonder if that is just the start of something even worse.
