Q: Observer/Subject pattern with asynch calls I'm trying to implement an observer pattern with asynch calls, something like this: `class SomeClass { private subject = BehaviorSubject(null); public Observable someProperty { get { return subject.asObservable(); } set { subject.onNext(value); } } public void someMethod() { someProperty.subscribe(...); } }`

BehaviorSubject is supposed to be a thread-safe class. Since the subject object will be part of a thread that does not own the current Subject instance, I'm wondering how Observer/Subscriber is supposed to unsubscribe from the Observable that's already been completed. Ideally I want to have the observer instance outside the scope of any thread that owns the subject, but a small delay (or any other way) to force the unsubscribe call would not be a problem. I'm looking for a solution similar to this: EDIT: Subject is a wrapper around BehaviorSubject so it has only the one onNext/onError/onCompleted functions. A: This looks like a textbook usage of Observable. While you could approach it this way and just get the subscription and call unsubscribe() before the Observable.complete() (so the subscription is in a container thread), I do not think this is a good idea. BehaviorSubject is an extension of Observable and - if
