An easy-to-use Final Cut ProÂ .Q: Template inheritance question in C++ I have a class Template, which is a template class with a particular T and some operations on that. Next, I have two different classes: public class Base { private: int a; public: int getA() { return a; } } public class A : Template { public: int getA() { return Template.a; } int setA(int x) { Template.a = x; } } The problem here is that Template.a returns a reference of T instead of a copy, and I need to get a copy. The problem is that, in order to get the reference I would have to override the setter function in order to copy the T reference, and the Base class has no such setter functions. So I'm asking: Is there some way I can get a copy without implementing some "virtual copy" function? Thanks! A: Is there some way I can get a copy without implementing some "virtual copy" function? The problem is that Base does have some constructors that the compiler will generate. It seems unlikely that you want a user of the class to be able to construct a Base from a Base, for example. This is a problem that inheritors are expected to solve. One possible alternative, of course, is to restrict access to the protected members of Template. So you might give the derived class a protected constructor that initializes the members of Template. Manniam Manniam is a village in the Palakkad district of Kerala state in India.
