A prospective, randomized controlled clinical study was performed to compare the efficacy of tacrolimus ointment and the steroid preparation for atopic dermatitis treatment (experimental vs. control group) over a period of 4 weeks in a total of 82 patients (all were diagnosed with atopic dermatitis according to Hanifin and Rajka's criteria). Data were recorded using SCORAD (SCORing Atopic Dermatitis) index, 2-step scoring. Data processing in both groups was carried out in two stages, firstly by dermatologists in all patients, secondly by data researchers, who were pharmacists/statisticians. Clinical evaluation of both groups during the first week of treatment did not demonstrate any statistical differences. These differences were detected in both groups on the second evaluation (third week). Tacrolimus ointment was found to be significantly more effective than the steroid preparation in the first and second stage of evaluation
