Optimize your score and save your time.Q: How can I get my website to recognize each user's input? I have a basic web page with a button on it that when clicked, takes a user to another page. I want to make it so that when the page loads, I want to make it so that whatever the user types in will be displayed to that same paragraph that has the button in it. How can I go about doing that? A: If you have a textarea, you can use javascript to get its value on page load. If you do not, then here's a JQuery solution. Let the button take you to a new page and have a div with an id of "textArea", and let that div be hidden. On page load, show the div and set its value to the textarea's value. JQuery: `$(function(){ $('#textArea').val($('#textArea').text()); $('#textArea').show(); });` Help us make a difference! Disabled Seniors Make A Resilient College Classroom Disabled Seniors Make A Resilient College Classroom Posted by: Alyssa Stual on June 17, 2012 While students in high school are often kept apart from the rest of the class, the unique needs of college-bound students often prevent this. Students who are considered "different" get left behind in that inaccessible classroom setting. But at the Greenville Ross' Walden University, there is a different kind of classroom. Students with disabilities, whether they may be learning English or diagnosed with a physical or mental impairment, are not ignored when they come to college. 3e33713323
