Q: Invalid (V,V) Entry in assembly I am just trying to test assembly language for my MCSA, for an x64 machine. I compile the following sample code into an.exe. `int main() { int (*a)(); return *a(); }` And the output is: X = invalid (V,V) entry What does this mean? A: This is not an error. In fact, this is how code is compiled. When you declare a function, you are telling the compiler that you want it to generate code for you. When you do this, the compiler gives you your function's prototype, which tells you which type it expects and returns, etc. So, by declaring `int (*a)();`, the compiler knows that you want it to return an int, and so it generates code to do that. If it did not do that, it would have to generate a separate code segment for just returning an int! (In fact, this is done, and it is called code generation - the compiler generates machine code directly without going through the intermediate form of an assembler.) If you use a function pointer like this, you can call the function using the address of the pointer - what you are doing is calling the function pointed to by the pointer. Q: Using 'this' in a ternary condition? I have a page with a gridview in it, with a datakeyname, which then filters the list on the server side, then binds the user control to the ItemSource so they can edit the details of an item in the grid. It runs smoothly and does what it needs to do, but I've had to extend this. This page also allows an admin, otherwise authenticated user to edit the details of items. The
