In a perimenopausal age group of women, 10 of 38 women (26%) were diagnosed as having aerobic bacterial vaginosis (ABV) while 18 of 38 (47%) were diagnosed as having anaerobic bacterial vaginosis (ABV). One patient had an ABV in association with Candida albicans vaginitis. Intravaginal infection of the species Gardnerella vaginalis was noted in eight patients, including six patients with ABV (62.5%) and three patients with aerobic bacterial vaginosis. Two of these six patients with ABV (33%) who also had G. vaginalis intravaginal infection had normal findings on vaginal cytology. Five patients had Candida albicans vaginitis, which was not significantly related to ABV. Three patients had an atrophic vaginal discharge that was significantly associated with ABV, whereas the relationship between this vaginal discharge and aerobic or anaerobic bacterial vaginosis is tenuous. These observations suggest a potential relationship between aerobic or anaerobic bacterial vaginosis, particularly with G. vaginalis intravaginal infection, and an atrophic vaginal discharge in perimenopausal women. Complex partial status epilepticus (CPSE) is a semiological seizure disorder with heterogeneous onset, prognosis, etiology, and treatment response. We present 2 cases of recurrent CPSE with a partial amnesic syndrome. The seizure onset was associated with agitation, confusion, and restlessness in both patients. After cessation of seizure activity, both patients had a period of transient global amnesia (TGA), and they recovered within a week. To our knowledge, TGA after CPSE has never been reported. The reported cases and our 2 new cases suggest that TGA can be a common clinical manifestation of recurrent CPSE. TGA and chronic insomnia might be prodromal symptoms of recurrent CPSE. Future studies are required to determine whether these symptoms can be used as indicators of impending seizure activity, and whether they may help to predict the course of epilepsy after successful suppression of seizures.
