Even if it seems like this card is reading the map like a memory card, it's actually reading the map from the SD card. That's a big difference from Apple, etc. that use the "internal memory" to store the map. Now, when you buy a SD card that says "Data Storage" and one that says

"Memory", you may be looking for the size of the card. SD cards are constructed in tiers, from "MicroSDXC" (tiny) to "MiniSD" to "MicroSD", to "Standard SD", to "Mini SD" and to "High Capacity SD". Only the last 4 have the size you need. Some SD cards read the data like a "Memory Card", while others read the data from the SD card, like a "Regular Disk" that will open with the computer's File Manager. Read more about it here: An SD card for the TomTom Card will always read like a "Memory Card", which means that you need a "High Capacity SD" card. High Capacity SD cards are usually 4GB and they're very expensive. But they're only used for the Map, not the Points. 4GB is the maximum size of the SD card, not of the Map. Hi,

I bought this new card from Tom Tom for frequent trips to Europe but when I put it into my device (Carminat TomTom Renault 2011) it offers only 3GB for Tom Tom MyDrive - meaning no map, no live service, or whatever. That means that you can't use that SD card. If you want to use the map, you need to use another, cheaper, SD card. And you may be able to use the SD card with this (old) device. But make sure that the device can read the SD card, by setting it to "SD Card" not "Memory Card".
