Why do single nucleotide changes in DNA result in different amino acid changes? The theory I have in my mind is that since nucleotides are not that important in forming proteins, if there are a few single nucleotide changes, which are thought to affect protein structure, the changes would not matter. In reality however, single nucleotide changes result in changed amino acids. To me this would mean that protein structure is affected by just a few nucleotides, which is not what I thought it would be. A: To understand why this is true, it is helpful to look at what a protein is: A protein is a specific folding of amino acids. This folding has two significant levels: conformation (position of the amino acids) and "distance" (spacial orientation). Therefore, to have a protein, there has to be a specific conformation for each amino acid
