Neuro-oncology has come into its own in the last decade and has made significant progress. One of the major challenges of neuro-oncology is the identification and treatment of patients with central nervous system (CNS) dissemination of cancer. It is now evident that despite advances in neurosurgical technique and medical treatment, the prognosis of patients with CNS disease remains poor. The prognosis of patients with brain metastases is especially disappointing if they are diagnosed with limited oligo-metastases at presentation. Nevertheless, the spectrum of treatment available today has led to a significant improvement of the overall survival of patients with brain metastases, and might even render patients free from CNS involvement. In the course of this paper the authors will summarize the available strategies and results of treatment in patients with brain metastases from solid tumors. A novel management of patients with advanced metastatic carcinoma will also be described, focusing on the understanding of the pathophysiology of CNS involvement and innovative concepts in neuro-oncology. These new insights can be used to formulate treatment guidelines for patients with CNS metastases.
