After years of missing the cut, American athletes are competing with a wealth of experience, confidence and a new sport to call their own. The United States' 49th consecutive Paralympics will be held from August 7-18 in Rio de Janeiro. Depending on the sport, up to 1,500 athletes from around the world will compete to earn a medal in 37 different sports and 100 individual events, ranging from alpine skiing to wheelchair basketball. At the 2016 Summer Games, the United States has already claimed gold in archery, women's basketball, and table tennis; silver in men's soccer; bronze in wheelchair basketball and swimming. But the competition is far from over, with athletes competing through a dizzying route of 12 teams, qualifiers, and the regular event. The "B Team" The U.S. Olympic Committee has made it a point to diversify the team and use it as a springboard to engage future Olympic audiences. On Thursday, USA Basketball announced its B Team of Americans who'll compete at the Rio Games. The B Team is made up of experts who are identified as medal-winning candidates by their peers, with the tag "B" standing for "Best in the B Team." The B Team does not include Team USA's full roster, which includes 28 national team members, 16 Paralympic veterans, and 19 teenagers. Tennis players Madison Keys and Venus Williams are just two of the names added to the B Team roster. In fact, more than half of the B Team are Track & Field athletes, who include Americans such as sprinters Dafina Williams and Arian Foster. There's also a pair of Paralympians from the LTA community, including shot putt Rick DeMont and discus thrower Lana Gehrs. The 16 year-old athletes who make up the youngest group of Team USA are the brainchild of Paralympic gold medalist Steve Mariucci, who helped start Team USA as a way to engage young people and build programs focused on inclusion for those with disabilities.
