Kabir Khan Rachid (Teffan.rar). 84330. ♦Mingo’s Law, which would require any new federal legislation promoting non-violence, throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s. A few months ago, I went to a workshop where a member of the audience told the story of the day on the US Supreme Court ruled in the Pell case, a decisive, landmark victory against the prison-industrial complex. I’ve been thinking a lot about the “gut” of the system—how it functions, how it is constructed, and how it affects our daily lives. The fact that we are all so accustomed to the normalcy of the status quo also continues to impact how we view and treat our fellow citizens. For the thousands of people who have been incarcerated for years or decades in solitary confinement, living in small, concrete boxes with not even a small window is certainly not part of their daily lives. For them, solitary is an additional punishment of a specific crime that they committed. The same dynamic is played out within the “justice” system: In 1954, the Court decided in Terminiello v. Chicago that public places are subject to the First Amendment’s guarantee of free speech. One person’s “free speech zone” is another person’s “public forum.” The Court, siding with the government, has steadily expanded the exceptions to the right of free speech, from fighting words to “fighting words” and even, most recently, to “offensive” speech. Hence, arrests for “hate speech” are common. When blasphemy laws are in place, people can be prosecuted for merely expressing opinions the authorities don’t approve of. Prayers or sermons by religious figures are routinely banned from being delivered in public schools. The list is endless. None of this is new. It is a well-established phenomenon. What is new is that the old tactics are starting to take place in the “justice” system. edd6d56e20
