The province has launched its first campaign to reduce heavy drinking among young people, but the province is getting the message out there — at last. Ontario's first anti-binge drinking campaign is aimed at teenagers, but health officials say it's about everyone. Been-to-Bacchus — the new name for a program that allowed people to go to the Liquor Control Board of Ontario and pick up $10 bacchus vouchers — allowed teens to get discount drinks from as early as 10 p.m. to as late as 2 a.m. before restrictions were lifted. The province stopped the bacchus program last year, saying its main purpose was to encourage underage drinking and create an incentive for underage drinking. Health Minister Deb Matthews says the new campaign is not about government prompting people into acting but rather about creating a safe environment for all Ontarians. "It's also about making sure that we do intervene in moments of harm, and intervene early in moments of potential harm," said Matthews. "And that's what we will do, intervene, and that's what we will be doing by this campaign." Twee Lexie: The new youth campaign is designed to get young people to understand the dangers of high-calorie, high-sugar, high-salt foods like candy
