I take that principle very seriously. For three years running I've worked with and learned from my partner, Margaret Sullivan. We've been studying the ins and outs of breathless media coverage of sports matches (for our real clients, of course). Although we're just getting our first product started, here's some of what we have learned. Pretend You're a Professional Athletic Trainer If you're on the coaching staff, or if you're out there getting hyped up for a match, it's important to remember that you aren't just sharing the joy of a game. You're sharing a lot more than that. You're sharing the really big job of giving life or taking it away with your chosen teams. Every game you see is a vote on whether your team will live or die, and every single prognosticator and pundit has an opinion on that. What to do about this? For starters, you need to make yourself understandable to sports fans around the world. By hiring yourself to provide medical advice and analysis, you are going to be judging and rating each player, each coaching move, and each play. It's up to you, the team, and your clients to understand that this is not your personal opinion; it's a professional opinion and rating, a 10-page report that will not only be presented in your name but will show up in newspapers and on television and be used by many more people than you.
