The debut of HyperMotion Technology was originally announced at the FIFA Player Ignite developer conference in September 2015. At the time, EA Sports revealed that development on the technology was on track, with the team currently focused on adding more actions that reflect the intensity of real-life football. The technology has been tested by EA Sports and FIFA developers in the studio, and has reached an advanced stage of development. The technology is now ready to be tested on live players at a club before being used by the game developers to bring a more realistic playing experience. Sandra Bosch, general manager of FIFA, said: "We're now able to capture every player movement in the game and use it to provide a more authentic experience. Our goal is to bring a 'FIFA feeling' to the game, and we're very excited about the HyperMotion Technology." HyperMotion Technology captures high-accuracy player data using motion capture suits worn by FIFA 22 players, placing the player at the heart of the game's innovations. During development of FIFA 21, FIFA developers also refined the game's artificial intelligence to make the opponent more intelligent and dynamic. Full details of the introduction of the HyperMotion Technology can be found here: Like this:

We say that a B -valued bilinear map $T: B \times A \rightarrow A$ is A -balanced if $T(b,a) = b \cdot T(1,a)$, for all $b \in B$. In such a case, we may consider the (Banach) algebra \mathcal{A} of A -balanced B -linear maps and the Banach algebra homomorphism $\eta: B \rightarrow \mathcal{A}$ given by $b \mapsto T_{\{B,A\}}(b)$, where $T_{\{B,A\}}: B \rightarrow \mathcal{A}$ is defined by $T_{\{B,A\}}$
