FIFA 21 featured the first-ever licensed variety of "career mode" in a video game. Offering the most customization in career mode to date, fans and players alike were able to be themselves in their preferred game. This year, new features include:

Q: Why does my function increment the input parameters? So I have a function that has three input parameters, an integer, a double, and an integer. I have them set like this: `public static void update_score(int score, double distance, int previous_player) { // Set score to 3 if it's a new player if (score!= previous_player) { // Increment score by 1 if the previous player has played a game score++; if (previous_player == 2) { // Increment previous_player by 1 previous_player++; } } else { // Move previous_player back to 0 previous_player = 0; } // Move player from 0 to 2 previous_player = 2; // Move players distance back to 200 distance = 200; }` As you can see, each of the variables is being used to see what the previous person played. So if a player has 2 games, they will be at a score of 3, but the score stays at 3 if the person hasn't played a game yet. The score also increases by 1 every game someone plays, but after the first game, the score stays there. I think that it's because of the way I have the function call, but I can't really understand why. Does anybody know why this is happening? Thanks!

A: If you're checking whether a variable is equal to another variable, you should do it with: `if (score == previous_player)` A: `if (previous_player == 2) {` is not what you want. You mean to check against the previous value of `previous_player`, not
