Millions of Russians have fled their homes in Siberia, and they may be headed for Europe to escape the wildfires that are spreading across the country. Europe and Asia have been warned of the extreme weather expected as a result of man-made climate change by scientists. St. Petersburg is the main point of the Red Forest in the Krasnodar region. The forest covers some 1,500 square kilometers in Russia and its fires have burned down 3,700 hectares of Siberian forest. A blanket of fog has prevented authorities from noticing the fires. Kornilov has said there is no need to panic and that the Interior Ministry would arrange for people to help the forest burners. Russian authorities have been monitoring Russia's wildfires for decades. Many of the fires are now in the arms of Siberia's billion-dollar oil and gas industry.
