As per Scott, Cyclops only gets a new beard every couple of years. Going by the Liefeld Planet of the Apes story and possible interpretation above, it may seem odd that in days gone by, Futurama was a "cult phenomenon". We get the jump on our schedule with the upcoming 6-pilot season. With over 40 pilots vying for four spots on Season 6, the field will be narrowed down dramatically. Scheduling will come next, and after that, the actual comedy writers. As one of those piloting for season six, I can tell you that I was looking forward to working again with Ernie Kovacs. It's too bad that she couldn't physically do it. I still think they could have done something with what they have and made it good. The next round of Futurama episodes will premiere on Comedy Central in January. I think we can expect more frequent appearances of Doc from earlier in the series, as we close in on the 10 year anniversary of the show's original debut. Back in the original series, the President's son was seen as a significant character, appearing regularly. Probably his only appearance was as a cameo in "Brannigan Goes to College" as an unnamed character (the one with the curly blonde hair). Some people have mentioned this and other such characters in the past, but I think we'd be incredibly lucky if the Clampett Brothers turned up. I posted this in comicbookbug.com's thread about original series characters coming back, but after reading the comment from Malthus I felt that I should post it again here. This is what Futurama's creators say about the issue. Also, someone who is going to do a website dedicated to this kind of news (although it's not devoted to Futurama) and he's willing to publish guest articles from fans - if you're interested check his message board. I believe that the appeal of original series characters is based on the Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a heat-sensitive transfer recording medium having excellent color developability and color-fixability. 2. Description of the Prior Art Recently, heat-sensitive transfer recording methods have been widely utilized because of their low noise characteristics and freedom of operation without developing machines. The heatsensitive transfer recording methods are roughly classified into a dye sublimation transfer system and a thermal printing system. In the dye sublimation transfer method, a dye from a thermal transfer sheet is sublimated to record characters on a recording sheet. The thermal printing method generally uses a thermal head to produce heat for heating a color-forming material layer of a thermal transfer sheet in correspondence with data to be recorded. The color-forming material layer is thermally transferred to a transfer receiving sheet, for example, paper, which has been imparted with a heat-resistant transferability. In the case where the dye is thermally transferred to the recording paper for recording, the dye transferred to the recording paper has a poor color developability and a poor color-fixability, and the color-formed on the recording paper has a poor resistance to mechanical friction. In the case where the color-forming material layer of the thermal transfer sheet is thermally transferred to the paper, the dyes having already been transferred to the recording paper
