Ascended: The Adamant Codex I don't think I'll be updating the blog for a while. For once, I feel like I'm in a really good place with this game project, so there's really no need to keep working on it every day, and I'm enjoying the release almost as much as I'm enjoying the development of the game. I'll likely continue to post about it occasionally here, but I may not post anything until things are really taking shape. If you're like me, and you've invested so much time into this game already, it's a bit hard not to have these games have critical feedback and updates on a regular basis. I'm hoping I can at least keep some of you guys up to date with what we're doing. As you know, at the moment we're moving away from a turn-based game to an action-RPG. I realized while working on Aluneth that in order for this to work there had to be a more open structure. The player wouldn't be able to find specific places from previous maps, and there would be no way to find the next exit. This has also meant that some old content that would've required a bit of design work will be lost. Also, from a design perspective, the new engine we're using makes everything a lot easier, so it's going to be easier for us to implement new content and things like that. In terms of the new content we're working on right now: New main character: this is the new character we're working on. The art style is actually quite similar to the old Reisavas, but the build is a bit less bulky. New world: we're currently working on a new world and environment, and we're using real-time lighting to create the atmosphere. New character classes: we're currently working on a new set of classes that will be available later on. We're also in the process of implementing some new enemies and bosses to the different zones. Difficulty and progression in the game: we've already started work on the new difficulty system, with different level design for players of different levels, and a progression system which allows you to transfer items between characters in the form of "ink".
