The major objectives of this study are to determine whether oxidatively modified lipoproteins which accumulate in the plasma of uremic patients cause endothelial injury. Uremic plasma contains high levels of malondialdehyde- and copper- modified LDL. In the initial phase of these studies, heparinized plasma was incubated with LDL labelled with radioactive cholesterol. After incubation, LDL remained in the plasma was isolated by sequential ultracentrifugation in discontinuous density gradients and binding and internalization of LDL by human umbilical vein endothelial cells (HUVEC) was determined by cell culture and radioimmunoassay. High-density lipoprotein was also isolated from plasma by the method described above and binding and internalization of HDL by the cells was determined. The results showed that uremic serum caused a 2-fold increase in endothelial cell binding and internalization of LDL, and a 3-fold increase in the number of cells which was able to internalize labeled HDL. These results are the first to show that uremic serum causes endothelial cell LDL binding and internalization. Therefore, these studies will be extended to a direct measurement of LDL oxidation in the serum of uremic patients and in animal models of uremia and to determine whether there is an increased number of endothelial cells which are oxidatively modified. The hypothesis to be tested is that there is an accumulation of oxidative modified lipoproteins in the plasma of uremic patients. If this hypothesis is proven, it will be necessary to determine whether the endothelial injury is secondary to the oxidative modification or to the uremia itself. In order to determine whether the accumulation of oxidatively modified LDL is a causative factor for the development of endothelial injury, various dietary alterations will be evaluated to determine whether these treatments can modify the accumulation of LDL. The development of an animal model of uremia which resembles human uremia will be necessary. In the initial phase of the proposed studies, we will attempt to develop a mouse model of uremia with parabiotic studies. In the television and radio advertising industry, the performance of a commercial, including, for example, the completeness of, or the number of people who see the commercial, the quality of the commercial (i.e., the content of the commercial), whether an audience responds to the commercial, whether an audience watches or listens to the entire commercial, and the like, is highly dependent upon the television or radio ad campaign
