Molecular biology of the human iron-storage molecule, hemosiderin. Hemosiderin is the most common macromolecular iron-storage compound found in mammals. The molecular basis of this iron-storage function is unknown. To investigate the genetic basis of hemosiderin's iron-storage function, the human hemosiderin gene has been cloned and characterized. The hemosiderin cDNA encodes a 119-amino-acid residue protein. The hemosiderin gene is located on chromosome 17, and its coding sequence comprises a 49-amino-acid hemosiderin domain, followed by a hydrophobic domain at the C-terminal end. Northern blot analysis of human cell lines revealed two mRNA species (of 3.4 and 1.8 kilobases) as well as a minor (0.6 kilobases) species. The major species was present in all human cell lines, whereas the minor species was expressed specifically in cell lines of hepatobiliary origin. These findings suggest that the main species encodes the hemosiderin protein, whereas the minor species may have a regulatory function. Homology studies revealed strong similarities between the hemosiderin protein sequence and mammalian plasma proteins, suggesting that hemosiderin may have a functional role in plasma proteins or plasma protein domains.{} and [The Standard Model]{} (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Univ.
