Legendary composer Thomas B. Sullivan was the pioneer of the party game genre. He scored movies like “The Naked Gun”, “Beauty and the Beast”, “Flatliners” and “True Lies”, but also international hits like “Crimson Tide”, “Independence Day”, “Star Wars: Return of the Jedi” and “Pearl Harbor”. Because of his musical collaboration with director Roland J. Teske, he’s also had the opportunity to score game soundtracks like “Brak’s World”, “House of the Dead”, “Battlezone”, “The Warriors”, “GoldenEye”, “Parasite Eve”, “Robocop”, “Total

Recall” and “The Long Kiss Goodnight”. The man, who has received multiple composer’s, arranger’s and musician’s awards, is best known for his work in game music, but he’s also composed orchestral pieces and, most of all, film scores. His early work in game music was a bit different from what you hear from him today.

“Rock & Roll the Eskimo” was the first full-length game which Sullivan composed, and it was the only title he ever scored with vocals.

Then, he composed “DeathRace 2000” and “Vietcong” before he became the composer of Lucasarts classics like “Brak’s World”, “Halo: Combat Evolved”, “Halo 2”, “Halo 3”, “Conker’s Bad Fur Day”, “Lethal Enforcers”, “Star Wars: X-Wing” and “Star Wars: The Force Unleashed”. In 1997, Teske and Sullivan finally created the party game genre with “Ikaruga”. Then, they came with the perfect idea for a movie inspired soundtrack – they used the heroes’ voices from the movie as the game’s in-game audio. Back then, that was probably the only way to do it, since the synthesizer chips didn’t have enough memory to save tracks from one game and play them in another
