Direct model retrieval: A program can be written to retrieve drawings from the drawing database or to retrieve drawings and export them in various formats. By downloading a drawing file to the hard disk, the program may be used as a standalone application to read, process and write to the model, including deleting, erasing, modifying and transforming the model. The program can be executed as a service, with command line arguments and optionally include an optional user interface such as dialog boxes. If the universe is really a product of a creative act, then the creator, if he can be called that, would have to be beyond the universe, and there are no grounds for saying that he cannot be discovered by means of our present-day knowledge. It is not necessary to assume that his existence is either purely personal or absolutely necessary in any sense. He might be called an external cause, for he is certainly not part of the universe. To my mind it would be most suitable to attribute the term "god" to such an external cause, if it can be shown that this has objective reality. The idea of a creator is not necessarily an atheistic one, since a "creator" might have a purpose other than the creation of the universe, or even several universes, as in the case of a personal god. That "god" of his could be nothing more than the essential being from which all the rest emerged. He would be the eternal creator and lawgiver. He would not be the father of all things, since he would not be involved in their production. He would be the friend of our reason, but not its master. His existence does not become clearer the more we approach it, but less and less. That would leave the universe to be the product of chance. The question of what chance is, and what is the relation of chance to God, is a complex one. It would be interesting to see what Einstein's conclusions on these matters would have been had he lived until today, after the discovery of ca3bfb1094
