Jacob, a little boy on the autism spectrum, is building a boat and sailing it across the sky to a distant world, where he will find a new home. Jacob: Beware the tasks he sets himself, every test is a step towards success. Every trial is his way to a better life. He will start with the simplest but the most difficult. He will try to pass test after test. He will study his lessons. He will remember to avoid challenges that bring him no joy. This is Jacob's struggle. Jacob's Journey is a Puzzle-Adventure Game that tries to find a balance between complexity, freedom, challenge and fun. The core mechanic is based on the concept that every game contains elements of a puzzle. If someone hadn't figured out how to get an Egg to hatch, it wouldn't make any sense to try and come up with a new method of breaking eggs. That's why in Jacob's Journey, difficulty is defined by varied parts of a single game. In Jacob's Journey, ease, freedom, and simplicity are defined as you avoid challenging elements while you progress. During these tests, Jacob will be tempted to cheat. The player must guide Jacob through these trials in order to lead him to the path of simple, meaningful, but also successful life in a world that needs his help. This game is a quest. The player must help Jacob not only find his parents, but also save the planet. To this end, we propose a simple modification of the Franklian hedonic calculus and we use it to study the optimal and suboptimal consumption patterns of different types of individuals. An individual can be both satisfied and unsatisfied in certain needs. Based on this idea, we calculate the happiness

Storyline Storyline: Crafting a storyline for a "Zale's Choice" episode is always a challenge. How do you begin to put together a show spanning eight or so years? Sometimes, the easiest way is to start with the answers to questions from the previous season and then find a way to incorporate them. In choosing to continue the story line from the conclusion of the previous episode, "Death of the Dinosaur," I followed the intent of the fictional events in the show as well as where they had left off. The following excerpt comes from the beginning of the fifth season, episode 23, "The Completion of the Grotto." "Cut to a high-security lab in the Rocky Mountain Area where a dinosaur skeleton is being prepared for transport. The bones are packed in a wooden box, then carried by crane into a large metal cage and carried through a large hatch into what appears to be an internal aircraft." The scientists are boarding to backtrack into the Grotto where they hope to find the Doc and Grotus. The idea is, that most of the Audubonian scientists and hired mercenaries will board the research craft to continue their pursuit of the Doc and Grotus. From the hatch, the box is lifted into a large aircraft section, including a cockpit, nose, and wings. The end of the box is opened, revealing the crate is empty. The crate is further opened and expanded by a large overhead crane that hoists the crate into the aircraft itself. Peering inside, one scientist reports the crate is empty except for a large plastic bubble that was part of the packing and measuring process. The aircraft is refueled and technicians inspect the aircraft before takeoff. Synopsis for episode #3, "The Prey": The fourth episode of the season, "The Prey," begins with a brief scene where the Rescue Crew are careening along the highway during the night. We see the Doc and Grotus driving along in their pickup toward the Collector, as described in the cartoon story for "Zale's Choice." The Collector stops, where the group find Doc and Grotus suffering from heat exhaustion from having been fast asleep on an uncomfortable mattress. The Crockett family in "Zale's Choice" are not big fans of the Collector. The
