Its approximately 23,000 participants and their families are not only acquiring new skills but also learning to manage their health. "The self-discovery inherent in learning to cook and being able to call on these skill sets when needed is a major benefit to someone trying to make healthier food choices for themselves or their children," said Peggy Carpenter, the foundation's program director. "It's about teaching yourself to manage health." At the free lunchtime cooking classes, children form small groups to learn the basics of the seven food groups, a four-part nutrition guide that emphasizes key nutrients like calcium and protein. This year, the No Kid Hungry Foundation also launched its first online cooking course, which includes recipes and health tips. The nonprofit also held two cooking workshops this year for inner-city children in Detroit and Philadelphia. The foundation started eight years ago as a unique social experiment that included an "eat-this" challenge for volunteers who worked in a soup kitchen and a homeless shelter in Kansas City, Mo. It was hosted by the Otto Bremer Trust, an organization that focuses on providing services for Kansans with developmental disabilities. When they returned to Kansas City, many of the volunteers said their cooking skills had grown, and they wanted to help others learn to cook, Carpenter said. That response also came from a family that ate many of the meals at the soup kitchen and shelter, according to the foundation's website. "After each feeding, we would ask people if they had learned anything new about nutrition," said Fisher, the foundation's executive director. "People, every single one of them, said, 'Yes, you taught me something I hadn't known before.'" Instead of feeling guilty about the food they fed their children, Fisher said, it was a positive that a meal was being created that would help them make healthier choices in the future.
