Techniques for the preparation of pharmaceutically acceptable microencapsulated drug-containing solutions for injection would be improved if the flow rate of the solution was increased. The flow rate of a solution could be increased by increasing the diameter of the needle, by reducing the length of the needle, or by increasing the speed at which the needle was inserted into the solution. To determine the effects of the needle length on the flow rate of solutions, six needles having various lengths were tested. The results showed that the flow rate of a solution was increased as the needle length was decreased. The diameter of the needle was also related to the flow rate. For the five needles tested, the flow rate was similar at about the 27% length of the needle. The volume of the solution extruded and the required force to extrude the solution were also related to the needle length. The flow rate was increased as the speed of extrusion was increased. The extrusion volume increased as the speed of extrusion was increased. When the speed of extrusion was increased from 0.050 to 0.15 ml/min, the extrusion volume increased from 5.5 to 20 microl. The amount of force required to extrude the solution was decreased by increasing the extrusion speed. In conclusion, it is possible to increase the flow rate of solutions by decreasing the length of the needle and/or increasing the speed at which the needle is inserted into the solution. Update: Preliminary results now in -- George McGovern wins So we expected the new George McGovern to get clobbered on election night, and with a bigger margin of defeat than the previous George McGovern ever got. But we didn't expect a 5,000 vote margin. That's what we're seeing with the preliminary returns now that we're getting in our mail-in ballots. There are signs that can only be described as favorable for George McGovern in the coming months, assuming that he plans to stick around to the convention. The Nixon forces are working very hard to see that 6d1f23a050
