It's exactly that, though, there's nothing that prevents Kotonoha no Niwa from being entirely its own thing, and it does it with such dignity that the film is a joy to watch. Speaking of the animation, well there's nothing that I can think of that could surpass these sequences, or at least I cant think of one that I would prefer as the visual centerpiece of the experience. It's pretty incredible the amount of detail Shinkai put into this film, especially the background, to the point where I would say that Kotonoha no Niwa is the most beautifully animated anime film of all time. The entire film is a work of art. Kotonoha no Niwa feels a lot like it was made for the people who've been waiting for a Shinkai film to come out, and it's a film that is easily so beautiful that it can be enjoyed as a classic in its own right. Kotonoha no Niwa feels like a truly wonderful studio film, and its a film that will be enjoyed time and time again, even if you've seen Shinkai films before. Kotonoha no Niwa felt a lot like it was more focused on the individuals throughout the film, rather than the actual romantic part of the relationship, they slowly build together. Because it is one of those forbidden or taboo loves -- that tend to pop up a lot in Japanese entertainment -- the people involved were fleshed out well, and outside relationships were more complex than just Takao and Yukari falling in love and everything is perfect. I believe that the ending of Kotonoha no Niwa has more potential in it than most people realize, especially those who dismissed it as a made up story that was never supposed to have a reason, and who felt that it was a poorly-planned and arranged ending. The reason that Kotonoha no Niwa needed to be resolved in such a way as to include Takao living with Yukino and Yukino living with Takao was so that Kotonoha no Niwa would fit into the Shizuko universe, which is and always has been a world that revolved around the love of Takao and Yukino. Kotonoha no Niwa also needs to exist in its own world, with a plot centered on Takao and Yukino. So basically, it needed to do as much as 5cm in order to make it work.
