expansion and contraction joints. concrete is generally expected to swell and contract along its surface with time, and this is why the recommended time period for concrete moves (cycles) is seven to fifteen years. however, in concrete which experiences early settlement, the original slump and the dry density is not the most relevant, and this becomes especially important in slabs.

polymer anchors are used to reinforce an existing crack that is in a vital region and offers the potential to burst open the crack. in this case, it is not uncommon to see small cracks, and their repair, in order to stop potential water ingress, as they will compromise the strength of concrete. however, they can be used in the repair of larger cracks by producing a force which allows the crack to break open. the internal edge of the polymer anchor must be straight and vertical, and the crack must be free of any voids or cold joints in order to be repaired. a combination anchor is a two- or three-way connection that spans the crack with a single anchor anchor. a combination anchor may be used in one-part construction, or may be installed in multiple parts with the aim to bond the two or more separate surfaces together. if the crack is free of any irregularities and there is no void, the repair method must adhere to the crack width. stabilized polymer that can be used to fill a crack and to provide a structural anchor that can withstand the required pull force. it is often used in the reconstruction of concrete structures that were damaged by an earthquake.
