Students of sociology are already studying gender, race, and sexuality, but their research doesn't start in the classroom. You have to look at how we live our daily lives as individuals and also at the system itself, said Carrie Ward, associate professor of sociology at the University of Oklahoma. There are 17,000 students on that campus and they live in a single-gender residence hall, with almost all of them sharing men's rooms. "I would never have thought to address those issues as a student," said Ward, whose honors thesis explored the use of single-gender bathrooms. "My point has been that 'Gender is a social construct.'" Possibly not surprising, this has been a hot issue here, also. For those living in an all-male environment, it doesn't seem like a great place to live, and it can be especially difficult for trans students. Students on the OU campus last year were caught off guard when a transgender student said she was forced to use a bathroom to which she didn't feel comfortable being assigned, according to an article in the Daily OK newspaper. OU student Annette Wright told The Daily OK that when she arrived on campus in the fall, she was told that her gender expression meant she could no longer use the men's bathroom. A student had called the school's administration in May and left a message for an administrator that Wright was a trans woman, she said. "I heard nothing," she said. "I was very confused, and I was trying to make sense of it." She was new at the school, and the university also had fewer resources to help her find information. The student asked the administration to move her to a women's bathroom. Administrators told her that they had no
